7 questions we have after the first episode of 'Liar' last night

Like the wine glasses: so.many.questions. 🙄 🙄

Last night saw the first episode of ITV's Liar aired on TV - and viewers were gripped from the very beginning.

Only read on if you have watched the entire first episode of Liar...

The programme sees two versions of the same night come to light, one in which the female character Laura (played by Joanne Froggatt) is raped, and the other that it was consensual sex, according to Andrew (Ioan Gruffudd), the man Laura went on a date with.

The thrilling first episode floored us, and we can't wait to watch the next 5. But we did have a number of questions which were left seemingly unanswered by the writers. These 7 are our most burning...

Why did Laura's clothes get taken for evidence when they weren't the ones she was wearing during her ordeal?

Victims of sexual assaults are told to try not to shower and keep on their original clothing while they report their crime and undergo physical examination. However, understandably, one of the first things victims find themselves wanting to do is getting clean. Laura removes her clothes and showers when she awakes the morning after her ordeal, and goes to report the crime in new clothing and wet hair. So why did they take her clothes into evidence when they were the ones she put on after her shower? What happened to her clothing from the previous night?

How did forensics miss the wine glasses in the dishwasher?

The final scene had some on Twitter perplexed. Laura explains to her sister she believes Andrew drugged her, by switching their glasses when she went to get a picture in the other room. She claims he was drinking from the glass with her lipstick stain when she returned and then put the glasses in the dishwasher to hide the evidence. So why did forensics leave these glasses rather than taking them to examine?

Why would Andrew have to swap the wine glasses when he poured the wine?

The next wine-related question is why Andrew would even bother to swap the wine glasses in the first place. Surely if he wanted to drug Laura, he would have put the substance directly into her wine glass rather than his own to then swap over. He also poured the wine in the first place, so could have also done it then.

Did his phone really lose battery?

It seemed rather convenient for Andrew that his phone battery died just as he reached for it to book a cab home from outside Laura's house. While it was probably legit, this move could have been Andrew's way into his date's house in the first place and prove he had planned an assault if it was in fact still working.

Could the whole thing have been avoided if they just had Uber?

No, really. While some GLAMOUR staffers are convinced the taxi driver who drove Laura to her date is responsible for her attack (hmmm), others have pointed out that the reason Andrew stayed at Laura's for so long is because his taxi was going to take a whopping 40 minutes to arrive. Surely if they had had Uber, the car would have arrived within a short 5 minutes? Who knows...

What significance does Laura's sister's affair with her ex have?

We've got to be honest, we thought things got a little far-fetched when it was revealed that Laura's sister was having an affair with Laura's ex boyfriend Tom. But it must have some kind of significance somewhere down the line, right?

What happened 'last time' - and what does Laura's medical history have to do with everything?

We keep hearing things about what happened to Laura 'last time'. For example, when Laura's sister's husband hears about the rape, he says "Do the police know about last time?" We wonder just what this could mean, and whether the several inferences to Laura's mental state of mind have anything to do with it. Interesting...
